The starry aspects of this glad season are vividly depicted in an astronomical plaque that hangs above the jewelry room mantel. This work by Marie Frey, jeweler, craftsman, teacher, in deep blue enamel and silver, is an authentic reproduction of the December heavens. The fixed stars are in their proper position with the Star of Bethlehem much as the shepards and wise men saw it long ago. This work required much research and labor and is truly a heavenly jewel. The proposals put forward at various times are:

3. An annual Founders Day celebration.

4. A Welcome Wagon.
5. Making available free a scale township map showing historical, cultural and commercial

6. Making available a short history of our town.

The biggest item on the list is, of course, the Arts Center, says Leaycraft. But this could start slowly today with exhibitions of the work of early Woodstock arts, or play readings in some Woodstock studio. Often it is necessary to start slowly and show in concrete form what is proposed before the money for a full scale program can be obtained.

Christmas Pageant

The second item, the Christmas Pageant, could perhaps be put on by the Woodstock School P-TA through the P-TA school dramatics group, cooperating with the committee that plans the Christmas Eve program on

For Founders Day, says Leaycraft, plans could be made now for appropriate ceremonies and pageants to be put on some-time during the summer, Here business groups, with the cooperation of the Turnau Opera Company, the Maverick Concerts, the Ulster County Folklore Society, Woodstock Historical Society and perhaps the Legion Auxiliary and the various church social groups, could select an appropriate theme, plan a brief pageant, and arrange for other ceremonies honoring those who founded Wood-

Intellectual Snob Story

An intellectual snobbery is operating today against high school students who aren't destined for college.

Walter M. Lifton, of Science Research Associates, Chicago, says that "We have neglected to honor the many kinds of intelligence beyond those found in the areas of verbal, quantitative, or reason-

Writing in the December issue of the NEA JOURNAL, monthly publication of the National Education Association, Lifton points out that of the 22,000 different kinds of jobs, only about 11 percent For This Sunday Here require professional preparation. Many of the rest, Lifton says, do equire advanced preparation but not necessarily in college.

Increasing demands on education have emphasized college attendance and the vigorous recruitment of bright students into the the spotlight comes Doris Faye, equally as clever with her hands areas of mathematics, physics, and engineering and have caused many of us to lose perspective.

"We tend to forget that without supporting services the professional cannot translate his skills into services that are helpful to society. We forget that excellent technicians also require a high level of intelligence, despite the fact that their training may be received in places other than a college."

And he concludes: "At all educational levels, we need to emphasize that education can never end-either with high school or graduate school. Cultural enrichment must become a lifelong process for all members of our society."

Write Way in Five High Schools

A new program designed to teach high school students to put their thoughts on paper more effectively started this fall in five American schools.

Dr. Arno Jewett, director of the new project sponsored by the National Education Association, describes how it works in the December issue of the NEA JOURNAL.

He says the new English Composition Projects in high schools in Cleveland Heights, Ohio; Ardmore, Pennsylvania; Richmond, ginia; Greensboro, North Carolina; and Lansing, Michigan, are designed to test several theories about teaching students to express

The first theory is that students who do their writing in classwhere there are adequate reference materials do a better job than those who write compositions at home

The second theory is that students who write a theme every week become better writers than those who write less often. Third is that English teachers who have theme readers to help them correct student papers can spend more time teaching and, day, Dec. 7 from 2-5 p. m. therefore, teach better.

Fourth is that students who write themes in class for immediate Mrs. Donald Schoonmaker Sr. correction become more independent, more able to direct themselves not only in writing but in checking and proofreading and

To test the theories, the five schools in the project have set aside English Composition Laboratories, where 7th to 12th grade 🔺 students can write themes. The laboratories are stocked with refactress, comedienne, musician and magician. She has starred as

And the participating English teachers have the help of theme readers— housewives, for the most part, with college degrees in English and a demonstrated capacity to write well themselves. The heme readers not only read English class themes, but major papers written by students in other classes as well. In this way, the students are checked not only on their written expression in English themes, but in all other subjects, too.

Jewett says the need for improvement in high school composition is shown by the 70 percent of the colleges that "are required to offer remedial work in English" and by the 150,000 students in 1960 who failed the college entrance tests in English.
